STONE BREATH

Chapter One

The Songs He Carried

This is placeholder text — a design preview showing exactly how your Chapter One will be typeset: the drop cap, the line measure, the leading, and the generous margins of a real trade book. When you send me your true opening, your words replace every sentence on this page, and none of the craft changes. The reader who opens this file should feel, in the first three seconds, that they are holding something made with care.

A well-set page is quiet. The eye falls into it without effort — the indent marking each new paragraph, the justified edge holding the column like a wall of dry-stacked stone. This is the frame your story deserves: nothing loud, nothing that competes with the words, only the words given room to breathe.

When your manuscript arrives, this preview becomes the real thing: the full chapter, flowing across as many pages as it needs, each one carrying the running foot below and the small gold mark above. The last page will close with a single invitation — keep reading — and the door to the rest of the book.

Send the chapter, and I will set it exactly like this. The cover you already have is world-class. The interior will match it.
